11Q: an inverted conic object in an object Quick question: How can I "draw" objects like in the picture below in blender? As shown I have a box, and I would like to have a cone inside the box which has some sort of a hole in it (I did that with the mirror modifier). Is this possible in Blender? Is there a quick way to do this? Here is a picture of how I used the mirror modifier to make it look like an inverted conic (I use that so it looks like the object is lying on its side). A: Easy enough. Make the box you want, and rotate it 45 degrees on the X axis. Add a curve object, and select the top side of the box. In the curve object, press F to fill the curve. Press Shift+S > Cone. Change the type to Surface, and in the Offset box set it to 45 (for a center cone, 45 works pretty well if you're not trying to make a sharp corner like that). Then press Z a couple of times and you should have a cylinder. I did this on a play test to try it out... Be sure to look at this question and this question if you want to make a sharp point, though.
Measurement of endonuclease III at subcellular sites. Endonuclease III was detected in nuclei, cytoplasm, and chromatin, and in each of the fractions, the enzyme was measured in terms of enzymatic activity or level of protein. More than 10% of the enzyme activity was associated with nuclei, while less than 10% was associated with cytoplasm. In contrast, approximately 50% of the endonuclease III protein was measured in nuclei and less than 50% was measured in cytoplasm. The cytoplasmic portion of the enzyme correlated with the measure of protein.
