Antagonists reduce the rate of development of force of canine flexor digitorum profundus muscles during tendon loading. The rate of development of isometric force during a twitch-tetanus test was measured before and after a 5-h period of unloading in 23 canine flexor digitorum profundus muscles at a length of the muscle-tendon unit (LMTU) where 50% of the maximal tetanic tension had been developed. A 10-h period of recovery after unloading was also examined. Recovery of force was faster after a 5-h period of unloading than after a 10-h period. Maximal tetanic force decreased by 0.8% after a 5-h period of unloading and 4.3% after a 10-h period of unloading. The half-times of the development of force were reduced to 127% and 96%, respectively. The ratio of maximal to minimal twitch force was therefore increased from 4.1 to 7.0. The development of force was also measured in isometric conditions and when the resistance to force development was increased by the application of sinusoidal 3-Hz electrical pulses during the twitch test. The force potential of the muscle for a given increase in electrical stimulation was reduced by 25% after the 5-h unloading period, and this reduction was larger than the reduction of tetanic force. It is concluded that unloading has multiple effects on the active state of the muscle, with the ultimate effect being a reduction of the force potential for a given electrical stimulation.
