Justices rule for Planned Parenthood in 2 other cases Associated Press Updated 12:21 pm PDT, Wednesday, May 16, 2019 WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court rejected a last-ditch effort Wednesday to stop the release of secret videos that Planned Parenthood says are illegally edited and accuses anti-abortion activists of unfairly targeting the provider to hide what they say is evidence of criminal activity. The court declined to hear a last-minute appeal from The Center for Medical Progress (CMP), the group behind the videos, in one of four related cases that arose as the videos were being used to try to end funding to Planned Parenthood. The justices instead voted to let the disputed videos be released while the case is still pending in court. The decision by the court means the case is essentially over, at least for now. One of the cases will be back in court later this year. The others on Wednesday were: — A separate appeal over a disputed Kansas anti-abortion law, which was directed to the justices after an appeals court in Washington upheld the law. — A separate case challenging President Donald Trump’s administration policies on what happens to fetal remains after abortions. A federal judge found those policies unconstitutional. — And a separate case over Trump’s decision to allow medical institutions to refuse patients based on religious or moral objections. In all four cases, the justices ruled along narrow lines — that it was not yet ripe for judicial action or that a case was moot, or no longer live, and therefore not fit for the court’s consideration. In addition to CMP, the two other cases involved groups that sued after videos were released that led many states to cut off funds to Planned Parenthood. Planned Parenthood, which provides abortions, says the videos are heavily edited and accuses anti-abortion activists of using fraud and deception. CMP says it never

Dragon Age: Inquisition review - time for a new adventure (single player only) The good: Deep RPG System Adding melee combat was an excellent decision. It makes this game feel like a proper RPG. If you're not a melee combat fan, there are still plenty of races and classes to choose from and plenty of useful roles you can fill. Massive options for specializations and talent trees. E-Mages don't need to worry about mana, so they can take a more freeform approach to casting magic. The bad: Assassination missions have no more scripted dialogue. Automobile races have no more scripted dialogue. The grind is long and spread out. Bane enemies feel like a quick hit of challenge, but most of them come at you from the air and you aren't protected from it. The old: Too many bugs and glitches for me. Why I picked this up: I don't really mind the new battle mechanics. The compromises they made for single-player gaming have paid off. This game has more polish than DA2.

- The Good
- Deep RPG System The more I play the more I appreciate this game's balance of RPG elements and melee action. DA:II was somewhat of a disappointment to me. The combat system was okay, but the leveling and class choices were a huge letdown. This game has much more depth, thanks to the new lore and the focus on a well-fleshed-out system.
- Adding Melee Combat Was a Good Decision I'm glad that the game didn't use the more casual approach of DAII. Playing around with the battle system in small ways was really fun.
- BAce is More Enormous, Enforcing an Exploration Mindset Tons of new areas, big improvements to the existing locations. A world that has a sense of scale. The characters don't always have the best dialogue. Still, there's a good variety of characters and witty dialogue.
- Diversity Across the Board There are a variety of races and classes to play in this game. Each race is interesting and has distinctive powers and background stories. There are a ton of unique classes to play. The graphical style is beautiful and distinctive.
- E-Mage Classes You still get to

Q: React Native - Handling ajax request I'm implementing an ajax request to my backend, which I'm using nodejs + express. I did so by using: `var request = require('request-promise')` `request('').spread((data, status, headers, response) => { return data })` Now I need to handle the request and get the response in my React Native code. I'm using ES6 classes. How can I handle and return the response that is coming from the server? A: You can use the fetch API with React Native Basically, fetch is built in so you don't need to install a package. In your case, you would do something like: `fetch('').then(response => { if(response.ok) { return response.json() } else { throw new Error('Something went wrong'); } }).then(yourCodeHere)` If you want more fine-grained control over the requests, you could also use fetch polyfill. FYI: I'm doing a similar thing and the approach I'm taking is to have an Ajax class, which I then pass to the ReactNative. Here's the Ajax class that I'm using: `class Ajax { static async fetchJson(json, callback) { let response = await fetch(json); if (response.ok) { try { response.json().then(result => callback(result)); } catch (error) { console.log(error)`
