Hepatitis A virus (HAV) infection is an acute, self-limited illness transmitted through person-to-person fecal-oral contact. Following an importation of HAV into the United States in 1975-1976, HAV infections in US residents have been sporadic, with peaks in incidence occurring in different age groups each year. Among US residents, travel-associated HAV infections occur primarily in persons traveling from countries where HAV infection is endemic or where exposure has not been previously documented. Prior publications have not provided detailed population-based assessment of risk factors for HAV infection among US residents. To identify, classify, and measure the magnitude of HAV infections in the US resident population, a combination of population-based case data and laboratory surveillance was used to estimate HAV incidence by age group, sex, and calendar year. Publicly available case records and laboratory data were combined to calculate overall and age- and sex-specific incidence. During 2005-2014, overall HAV incidence among US residents was estimated to be 1.3/100,000 (95% confidence interval [CI] = 0.4-2.9), with incidence exceeding 3/100,000 in children ages 0-4 years (incidence ratio = 21.9, 95% CI = 7.1-62.6) and persons age 20-39 years (incidence ratio = 14.9, 95% CI = 8.8-24.7), and exceeding 10/100,000 in persons age 40-59 years (incidence ratio = 8.5, 95% CI = 3.2-21.4). Though HAV incidence was approximately three times higher among residents age 20-59 years than it was among residents of the same age group born in the United States, the magnitude of the difference in overall HAV incidence between US-born residents and foreign-born residents was variable c9d1549cdd

Swifter Than Bubbles Tue, 04/16/2012 - 04:59pmadmin By: Rick Shipherd BUBBLES Eric's Bubbles, the piece of excitement at last month's FFA Farmer Field Day, created such a happy buzz at the time he says the crowd probably didn't expect 50 people at $10 a head who didn't eat Bubbles. But they sure came for Eric's Bubbles. Served right after the pig races (which ran so late Bubbles was serving them around 3 a.m.), the people who chose Bubbles enjoyed the beverage after they ate a free sample of Eric's Bubbles with his menu. When he closes and moves on to the Ice House – also at Farmer Field Day – Bubbles plans to apply that same concept, both in customer service and in menu items, at both locations. This summer he's providing Bubbles for a nationwide food festival to benefit the American Cancer Society, and he's looking for a place to house his vendors. He says he's learned that the roads to success aren't always smooth. "You never know where you're going to end up," Eric says. "I've been coming to Lakeville for 15 years. I'm looking at the western part of town. It looks like, after the banquet hall, I'm going to take my Bubbles to the Ice House and see how that goes. I mean, you try to do a good turn, give the best service and help everybody out, but it's tough sometimes."
