[Peculiarities of optic-haptic motor coordination and its correction in children with cerebral palsy]. Haptic and optic motor coordination is an important factor of voluntary movements control. Children with cerebral palsy have deficit of this coordination, that means some disturbances in the neural control of movement. We studied peculiarities of haptic-optic motor coordination of these children in their motion events. Motor functions of the upper limbs were estimated based on the results of muscle tone and strength tests in 46 children with cerebral palsy: 14 in group of children aged 7-10 years; 12 in group of children aged 11-15 years; and 20 in group of control children. The haptic-optic motor coordination was studied in the motion events: arm reaching, single-step and double-step movement, arm pronation. The children were divided into groups depending on the severity of movement disorders. It is shown, that the children of both groups of cerebral palsy have disturbed haptic-optic motor coordination. The children with the most severe disorders of the motion, especially in children with hemiplegic cerebral palsy, manifest significant delays in the arm pronation motion event, while the arm reaching event is characterized by an increased speed in the children with milder hemiplegic and tetraplegic disorders. In children with hyperextensibility of the upper limbs, delays in the hand reaching event and the single-step movement were observed, that suggest the reduced compliance of the tendons, and in the children with decreased muscle tone, these delays were absent. The hand reaching and pronation events in the children with hemiplegic cerebral palsy were characterized by enhanced speed and reduced variability, indicating the intensive control of the movements in the children with more severe disorders of the motion.

Effectiveness of laparoscopy in the diagnosis of ovarian cancer and other gynaecological conditions. Laparoscopy has been used extensively in the diagnosis and treatment of gynaecological diseases. The aim of this study was to evaluate the diagnostic value of laparoscopy in gynaecology, mainly in the diagnosis of ovarian cancer. The authors further highlight the technical and technical problems of the procedure in this field. Various gynaecological oncological conditions are examined. A total of 1599 patients aged between 12-72 years who underwent laparoscopy because of various gynaecological conditions were included in the study. The standardised examination techniques and the differentiated diagnosis of ovarian cancer are described. Vascular and lymphatic invasion proved to have a specific value in differentiating between borderline and malignant tumours of the ovary. In the diagnostic process of ovarian cancer, vascular invasion and direct tumour invasion into the peritoneal cavity seem to have a stronger prognostic value than lymphatic invasion. However, further studies with larger study groups and more differentiated histological criteria are necessary before definitive conclusions can be drawn. The diagnostic value of laparoscopy in gynaecology is established; however, further studies are needed with more differentiated histological criteria. With the aid of ultrasound, tumour markers and CT, it is expected that the sensitivity will be raised even more.
