Zoophilia is a sexual attraction to animals. It is also known as Bestiality. And it's part of voyeurism, fetishism, zoosexuality, and zoophilia. There are no hard and fast defining factors of zoophilia, but it is often defined as the fantasy or practice of having sexual relations with an animal. Because Bestiality is illegal in most countries, and is stigmatized or perceived as a form of abuse, it's hard to define the prevalence of zoophilia. The United States Bureau of Justice Statistics describes an estimated 3 to 7% of men and 2 to 3% of women to have exhibited some form of zoophilia. The most widely cited figure for bestiality was quoted in a 1969 study by the Kinsey Institute: An estimated 6% of men and 3% of women had engaged in some form of non-human sexual behavior at some time in their lives. There is evidence that man ate meat even before the invention of agriculture, but the modern practice can be traced back to bestiality in the Netherlands in the middle of the Seventeenth Century, as men would watch women having sex with geese and other fowl, and then masturbate in front of the woman. The practice became more widespread during the "Second Age of Bestiality" that began in the early Nineteenth Century, as the moral boundaries of acceptable behavior loosened. The St. Katherine Society, a pornography trade organization, was founded in the early '30s as a trade association for the production and distribution of animal pornography and medical bestiality films. The organization subsequently expanded its interest to include zoophilia and other forms of what it referred to as "sex among animals." In England, where the press and clergy had openly condemned bestiality, a group of men decided to hold a convention to discuss their sexual practices with each other. The Second Conference of the St. When the society's secretary, who was in attendance, later tried to report their meetings to law enforcement, all
