The federal government was the first to establish a National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) with an Administrative Committee to interpret it and monitor implementation. The Supreme Court stated that the NHRC was unconstitutional and began a review of the design and functioning of the NHRC.

Advocates of the NHRC also challenged the constitutionality of the NHRC on other grounds. The government's attempt to convert the Commission into a full-fledged constitutional institution drew a strong response from Indian National Congress legislators and some of its constituents in parliament. The government appointed the NHRC Acting Chief Justice G. Rohini as its first Chairperson. India has one of the lowest overall crime rates in the world, according to a 2011 United Nations report, but the report also noted that there was a high rate of crimes against women: one of every three women said she had been raped, and nine out of 10 rape victims were women. Police-recorded rapes increased by 81%, as compared to 50% of the recorded thefts, and the number of criminal cases rose by 92%. The high prevalence of rape could be partly attributed to the widespread problem of sexually transmitted diseases. These could be blocked by testing all men for syphilis, gonorrhoea, chlamydia, HIV, and hepatitis-B, and condoms. Also in June, a high court in Bihar suspended a probe into the custodial death of a rape victim. The court order stemmed from a complaint that the Khimanna police station had violated her rights under the Constitution and the NHRC guidelines.

Following the order, police filed an appeal to a higher court seeking the suspension of the investigation and the chargesheet in the case.
