The Milan Blending modes, which were unchanged from Lightroom 4, are now more dynamic by allowing you to change between a variety of presets. In the past, the blending mode essentially stuck to the “Black and White” or “Color” preset. Now you can easily and quickly change between the three modes: “Black and White,” “Sepia,” or “Multiply.” It is a very useful feature. Regarding Lightroom, not much was added. For instance, workflows have been simplified and you can now search for all the photos in a folder from one screen. There are more options for how you make adjustments, and Shadows is one of the few new tools. Unfortunately, some of these new features will require a $19 upgrade. Although Lightroom 5 offers a free 30-day trial, Lightroom CC is designed for individuals, not academic institutions. In fact, anyone buying Lightroom 5 is forced to purchase the full version, even if they only want to use one or 2 of the applications for $19, a price that I find ridiculous. I hope that this is only a misunderstanding on the part of Adobe—a lot of people use the free download to get started, but once they find out that they have to pay $19 for the complete suite, they quickly give up. While I am not sure what they were thinking when they included this update, Photoshop CS6 has all of the same features as its latest version. If you are a CS6 user, be sure to see what you can still get from that rather than purchase this upgrade option. If you already own the full version software, I encourage you to upgrade to Lightroom 5. I like being able to use Lightroom 5 as a staging tool and working on images in Lightroom 5, while still being able to go back to another edit program to quickly make adjustments.
