In an electromagnetic flowmeter, a sensing unit constituted by a pair of electromagnet and a pair of sensing electrodes is disposed in a pipe through which a fluid flows. As a current passes through the fluid, the fluid generates a voltage which is amplified by the sensing unit and then is outputted from a terminal. By detecting the output from the terminal, the flow rate of the fluid can be obtained. Since the sensing electrodes are disposed in the sensing unit, it is important that the sensing unit is fixed in a specified position in the pipe. For this purpose

Gamma-glutamyl transpeptidase and intestinal damage in thalassemia intermedia. Intestinal dysmotility occurs in patients with thalassemia intermedia and is implicated in the pathogenesis of gastrointestinal bleeding. The mechanism of intestinal damage in thalassemia intermedia remains unclear. To test the hypothesis that intestinal damage results from increased release of beta-glucuronidase from intestinal goblet cells and from increased permeability of intestinal mucosa, we determined fecal enzyme excretion in 5 patients with thalassemia intermedia before and after deferoxamine therapy. Twenty-three healthy subjects served as controls. Fecal beta-glucuronidase activity was significantly higher in patients before and after therapy than in controls. Fecal lactulose and mannitol excretion were significantly decreased after therapy. The intestinal permeability to polyvinylpyrrolidone was significantly increased before and after therapy. The results suggest that increased release of intestinal beta-glucuronidase and increased permeability of intestinal mucosa contribute to the pathogenesis of gastrointestinal damage in thalassemia intermedia.Q: 79a2804d6b
